Abstract This study looks at how linguistic and philological research can be used in language education. People often think these subjects are for theory but they actually help with teaching creating curriculums and student growth. Linguistics helps us understand how language works and its structure. Philology helps us understand the meaning of texts in their historical backgrounds. Together they help improve teaching methods, communication skills and cultural understanding. Using linguistics and philology, in education makes language learning more effective and meaningful.

Introduction

Language learning is not about memorizing grammar rules and translating sentences anymore. Nowadays people think it is more important to learn how to use language in life situations. This is where language studies and research on language become very important. They help us understand how language works, how it changes and how we create meaning with it. Language studies focus on the rules of language while research on texts and culture looks at how we interpret language and what it means in contexts. So when we combine these two areas in teaching language learning becomes more effective and interesting for students. Language learning is about using the language in life and language studies and research on language help us do that, which is why they are so important, for language education and language education is what we are talking about here.[1] Language is really important to understand how people use it. This helps teachers to not teach things that do not work. Things like how words sound and how sentences are made are very important for teaching. They really help students who have trouble saying words correctly and understanding how sentences work [2]. For example if we study how sounds work in language teachers can figure out why students are having trouble with sounds and help them get better. They do not have to keep practicing the same thing over and over.

Language teachers also need to know about grammar. They should help students see patterns in language of just memorizing rules. This helps students use language in a natural way when they talk to people[3]. There are some ways of teaching language that are based on how language really works. These methods, like teaching people to communicate with each other and giving students tasks to do help students learn language in a more meaningful way. Language classes should be, about talking to people and students should be able to make their own decisions about what they want to learn. Language is really about understanding the meaning behind the words. When we study language in a way we look at what the words mean in different contexts and cultures. By analyzing texts people who are learning a language can improve their reading and writing skills. They also get to see how different cultures use language in their ways[4].

The problem is that it is not easy to teach language in this way in a classroom. Teachers often do not have the resources they need. They may not have the training to do this kind of teaching.. Even if teachers can only do a little bit of this kind of teaching it can still make a big difference in how well people learn language. Using real life examples and teaching that's sensitive, to the context can really help people learn language better[5].

Conclusion

Language education is really important. It can benefit from linguistic and philological research. These two fields of study are often seen as theoretical but they can actually be very useful. Linguistics helps us understand how language works, like its structure and how it functions. Philology is good for understanding what things mean. The culture behind them.

When we use both linguistics and philology together it helps people learn to communicate and think for themselves. So using both of these fields helps us understand language in a way as a way to communicate and, as a part of culture.

Language education can be improved by combining linguistics and philology which's what we should do to help people learn language better.
